Following the parliamentary elections in April and the European elections in June, the presidential elections marked the end of the super election year in Croatia. Despite major headlines about corrupt ministers, partisan presidents and hijacked constitutional courts, there have been no major changes in Croatia's political landscape. Why do the numerous scandals simply seem to roll off the country's two most influential politicians? And what about the political alternatives, from the far right Homeland Movement to the green Možemo!? We address these and other questions in a detailed analysis of the past twelve months.
